White House wants user-friendly electronic health records
ABC News
The Trump administration recently launched a new effort under the direction of presidential son-in-law Jared Kushner to overcome years of problems with electronic medical records and make them easier for patients to use. Medicare will play a key role, eventually enabling nearly 60 million beneficiaries to securely access claims data and share that information with their doctors. Electronic medical records were ushered in with great fanfare but it's generally acknowledged they've fallen short. Different systems don't communicate. Patient portals can be clunky to navigate. Some hospitals still provide records on compact discs that newer computers can't read. READ MORE

UnitedHealth Group hits $64B in value-based care spending
Forbes
UnitedHealth Group, the nation’s largest health insurance company, says it’s paying nearly 60 percent of its reimbursements – or $64 billion – via value-based care models that are rapidly replacing fee-for-service medicine in the U.S., according to the company. Value-based pay is tied to health outcomes, performance and quality of care of medical-care providers who contract with insurers via alternative payment vehicles like accountable care organizations (ACOs), a delivery system that rewards doctors and hospitals for working together to improve quality and rein in costs.
